Between 1854 and 1929, an estimated 200,000 orphaned, abandoned, or homeless children were transported from crowded Eastern cities like New York to rural communities in the Midwest and beyond. These children were placed with families willing to take them in, often for labor or to provide a home.

Instead of growing up in urban poverty and destitution, these children were given a chance to grow up on farms or in small towns.

At the time, there were few government welfare programs, so private organizations stepped in with innovative solutions.

The orphan train movement was revolutionary for its time, representing one of the earliest large-scale child welfare programs in the U.S. However, it was not without controversy.
